

What would you like to see happen
to the building?

(from www.yorkstories.co.uk survey)

Fill it with geese and demolish it at least six times
to make sure it's dead.

– Marc

Demolish it and have a green open space there instead, where people can sit and relax and the buildings hidden behind can be displayed once again.

(Anon)

I select "refurbish it" with a certain wariness: I fear it might end up with brightly-coloured plastic panels all over it, or that someone might put a pitched roof on the top. What I would hope for is something true to the spirit of the building, but making it more liveable-with at ground level. (Definitely no-one should knock down the tower and leave the plinth - if anything it should be the other way round, but I suspect that would not be structurally possible.)

– Ralph Harrington

As much as it pains me, at least part of this building should be retained. I would personally favour removing all but the tower, creating an open space with a centrepiece that warns of the folly of insensitive contemporary architecture.

– Arran Johnson

The relationship between the building and its setting needs attention as part of a refurbishment. Also, there is a great opportunity to create a roof top garden to replace the carpark. How brilliant will that be.

(Anon)

Turn into an arts centre, low cost offices for start up creative businesses and studio space.

– Julie Durrans